

Jschool students give journalism course top marks

Survey results from 2015 Jschool students have confirmed the journalism college's reputation in vocational education.

Head of Jschool Professor John Henningham said the results showed that the newly-developed online course had struck a chord with students.

"All our staff are very happy that student satisfaction is so high," he said. "No other course has a higher satisfaction level.

It gives us encouragement to work towards further improvements."

The survey, required under the federal government's registration and accreditation process, showed that 100 percent of students were satisfied with the Diploma of Journalism and would recommend it to others.

Students also said there was strong learning support and that teachers made subjects as interesting as possible.

Percentage results of student responses are as follows:

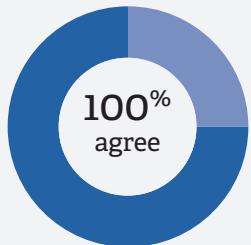

I developed the skills expected from this training

Jschool had a range of services to support learners

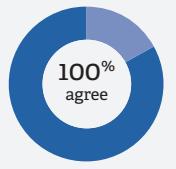

I would recommend Jschool to others

I got a job as a reporter working for a daily newspaper thanks to my Jschool studies and help given from the Jschool course director...

Course requirements and tasks are clear and simple (and a good departure from the lobotomized and unintelligible world of university academia, humanities related, in my opinion).

Jschool offers you the perfect way to learn and familiarise yourself with the journalism industry, at the comfort of your own home. Studying online can sometimes be daunting, as my greatest fear was the lack of motivation and guidance I would receive. But trust me, that is not the case with Jschool. The teachers and mentors are fantastic, and are always there for you to ask questions. And more than anything, the content that you learn is first class.

I would highly recommend this course to anyone looking to get their foot in the door in journalism. Don't waste your time on a three year degree when you can learn everything you need to know, and more, in less than a year with Jschool.

The small class sizes mean help is readily available and I could not fault the online course delivery. Very user friendly.
